

ABSTRACT

A method of designing human clinical drug trials in which the drug under study is administered to a defined population of test patients who have demonstrated a predisposition to responding to the study drug by virtue of their having one or more genes that have independently been determined to be associated with the desired response.

Express Mail
EL395941883US